Josie, in her mid-thirties, works as a hairdresser in a high-street salon. She notices a slightly older man in the lunchtime queue in a sandwich shop. His aroma of perspiration, oil and petrol attracts her in an unexpected sort of way. She discovers his name is Tom and that he is a garage mechanic working not far from the salon. Both are single people living with one surviving parent and are unused to dating the opposite sex. Although they lack experience, we hope they will get to know each other better. Sure enough, Josie and Tom slowly pursue the pathway to love. But the realities of everyday life intrude and their blossoming romance is tinged with occasional deep sadness. Thank goodness they have each other - someone to help and support through the difficult times. But everybody wants a happy ending, and this you are guaranteed. The couple finds contentment in marriage, which is just as it should be. If you are a fan of tender love stories then this book is most certainly for you.
