Pursuant to a congressional request, GAO reviewed market development activities of nine foreign competitors in Japan's agricultural market. GAO found that foreign companies: (1) spent considerable time and money to develop markets for their agricultural products in Japan; (2) expected to spend between 2 million and 2.5 million for the first 1 or 2 years to develop the market, and about 1 million for follow-up surveys, additional market research, and evaluation; (3) had to meet Japanese consumer standards for uniqueness, convenience, ingredients, and packaging; (4) used trade assistance and consumer education in developing consumer demand; and (5) gained greater access to the Japanese market by using nontraditional importation and distribution methods. This item ships from La Vergne, TN. Paperback.
