In sections taken through regions showing the transition toward the pithless type, an increase in the degree of signification of the central parenchyma is seen. The fundamental tissues of this root are so closely packed with starch (Fig. 4) in all cases examined that cell walls are with difficulty made out. This necessitates the clearing of the tissues by the use of caustic potash solution. The starch grains are spheroidal or ovoidal in shape when simple, usually showing a central or nearly central hilum. In the larger grains, distinct fissures are to be seen, often of unusual dimensions. Layers are hardly discernible without special treatment. Very often the grains are aggregated, forming compounds of two, three or four parts. They are united along their flattened sides, and form two-, three- or four-lobed aggregations (Fig. 4). The fibro-vascular bundles (Fig. 5) offer some difficulties when studied in commercial material. The phloem regions, especially, become so compressed and distorted as well nigh to baffle the student. An endeavor was made to get alcoholic material but without success. The phloem, seen in cross section, forms a sharply limited group of elements capping the wood wedge exteriorly (Figs. 1 2). The xylem areas are much more readily made out. They consist of a rather dense tissue in which large tracheae are scattered about, usually singly, less often in groups of two or three. Seen in longitudinal sections, they are heavily pitted and belong to the reticulated...
