Not illustrated. 1825 Excerpt: . . . come to them well taught even in the few elementary branches which their statutes require as qualifications for admission. I should be within bounds, were I to affirm, that, during my connexion with one of our most respectable colleges, not one youth in ten entered it thoroughly prepared. It cannot be supposed that the grammar schools are on a better footing in the western than in the middle states. The truth is, that no regular efficient system has as yet been adopted any where. This matter is left too much to chance, or to individual enterprise. Sufficient encouragement is not usually given to classical teachers to render their profession lucrative and honorable, so as to command the services of men of talents and learning. Without this inducemout, such men will seldom consent to teach; except it may be for a season, as a matter of convenience or necessity, and as the means of rising to some other and better occupation. p. 45. Our country needs seminaries purposely to train up and qualify young men for the profession of teaching. Though the idea perhaps may be novel to some persons, yet the propriety and importance of such a provision will scarcely be questioned by any competent judges. The Seminarium Philologicum of the late celebrated Heyne at Gottingen, though a private institution in the midst of a great university, furnished to the continent of Europe, during a period of nearly half a century, many of its most eminent...
